The U.S. Army's primary line of electronic attack is the Advanced Targeting Infrared for Night Sight (ATN-S) weapon, one of the largest and most expensive systems fielded by the U.S. military. The explosive RNADeOR (radio frequency active) rounds have been used to help target unmanned aerial vehicles, including the Hellfire missile. The weapon was just one of the technology tools developed for the Apache (AH-64D) Attack Helicopter, the most lethal attack helicopter in the world. That can support troops with networking technology that allows to utilize the Apache's sensor capability to target enemies via infrared sensors and laser-enhanced munitions. The joint strikes conducted by the U.S. Army's aviation brigade in the Philippines allowed the Apache to enhance the counterinsurgency capability of the troops' commander in that country and, eventually, on the U.S. territory of Puerto Rico as part of Operation White Eagle. These sorts of missions will one day be possible on a large scale. The U.S. Air Force is exploring this prospect as part of a $214 million project to continue adapting it for the new Long Range Strike Bomber program. The big question is how will the next steps be for the Army's traditional Close Air Support mission and its air-to-ground precision strikes. For that to happen, the Army will have to turn to another set of lasers. This time, instead of generating the energy needed for firing on enemy artillery, the goal is to use lasers as a platform for infantry and light armor troops to engage enemy targets. The Army is developing a laser weapon to be fielded by 2025 that can be integrated onto infantry vehicles or firing from the back of tracked vehicles. It will fire a single, 30-kilowatt laser that fires a beam with a spot diameter of 10 centimeters and a pulse duration of 3 microseconds. This weapon is intended to improve the soldier's accuracy and range. Researchers from the Army Research Laboratory, Naval Surface Warfare Center, Armed Forces Institute of Technology, and others have been working on this program. The result is the 3D Beam Laser Demonstrator (3D-BLD) system, a prototype that the Army is looking to integrate into the ground segment of an Integrated Laser Guided Small Arms Weapon System. The 3D-BLD will fire independently or in tandem with the Army's 5th

An example if the user is in German, the corresponding view should be loaded. The language is fetched from localStorage. And here my problem begins. The language in the tag works fine and the setLanguage method is called, but everytime I call this.myApp.navCtrl.setRoot(JHtml:;_(behavior.toolbar)); the data-ng-view is loaded in the view, but the very first tag is loaded! What is the problem here? Maybe it has something to do with the order of the methods? I tried to call this.myApp.navCtrl.setRoot(JHtml:;_(behavior.toolbar)); before I set the language A: The problem is simple. If you are calling setLanguage in any controller before the view is loaded (e.g. by setting the language programmatically, or changing localStorage), the view is not reloaded and the first tag is the one that is loaded. You can fix this in multiple ways. One way is to use StranslateProvider.useCurrentLang() if you just need to change the language only once, for example in a controller. Q: How to manage database schema changes with my own migration I have a simple application that uses django and sqLite database. I want to modify my database schema using migrations. The problem is that when I add the migrations file to the .py file everything works fine and migrate successfully but when I run ./manage.py makemigrations or ./manage.py migrate, the database has this error: User
