Overproduction of a protein, that in itself is harmful to the host, can have deleterious effects on the host. Thus, there is a need to develop methods to control the expression of genes coding for protein harmful to the host. In the case of cloned genes, there is a need for methods which permit controlled or regulated expression of such genes, for example in cases where the gene is expressed in non-plant hosts. A number of methods exist for regulating or controlling the expression of cloned genes in eucaryotic cells. U.S. Pat. No. 4,656,149 (a method for regulating the expression of a gene coding for an enzyme of industrial importance by regulation of the transcription of that gene) teaches regulation of a gene which is transcribed by a tetracycline-controlled T7 promoter. The patent does not teach controlled transcription of a gene using a tetracycline-controlled T7 promoter. A system based on regulation of transcription via a tetracycline-controlled T7 promoter is known as a "tet system", and is described in Schell et al. (1980) Nature, 287: 795-797. A tet system has also been described for the controlled expression of an insect gene coding for a harmful protein. Faure et al. (1983) Plant Cell Reports 2: 85-88 (a method for controlling the expression of a gene encoding for a juvenile hormone esterase) describes the expression of a transgene in an insect by transfecting C. elegans with an insect-specific gene under control of a T7 promoter. The transgene contained a copy of the T7 promoter, a gene coding for a bacterial tetracycline repressor and a gene encoding for an enzyme coding for a juvenile hormone esterase, a protein which is known to be toxic to the insect.Q: mySQL UPDATE with select statement I have a issue that I am unable to find help on. New data from the Environmental Protection Agency reveal that gas prices at the pump increased by about 13 cents per gallon, but the amount of gas you see at the pump is misleading. The amount of gas you see at the pump is misleading, with people paying about 9 cents less than you would think. Ethanol in gasoline costs about 20 cents per gallon more to produce than gasoline alone, and the energy savings is spent on the extra production costs. The average price of gasoline is generally rising to the highest levels it's been since 2012, which could be bad news for the U.S. economy. That's because Americans have been buying less gas in recent years. The Environmental Protection Agency announced that gas prices are "statistically steady" for the past three months, and the uptick in the price of gas at the pump is very small compared to previous years. "The average price at the pump is $2.60, which has shown no substantial change since the last three months," EPA spokesman James Owens wrote in a statement. "Since it's taken about four weeks for gasoline prices to average around $2.60, there has been no substantial change in prices for the average consumer. Gas prices continue to be higher now than at any point since last October, but this is not unprecedented." This statistic is also misleading because it's based on data that includes gas prices at the retail level, which is not where most Americans go. According to AAA, 90% of Americans will see their gas prices as reflected in the price at the pump. The other 10% is a number of people who use gas stations as their primary source of fuel. "In recent years, people have cut back on how much they're driving," Meredith Whitney, energy analyst and author of "Cold, Hard Facts: The Startling Truth About the Energy State of America," told Business Insider in January. There are several reasons why Americans are buying less gas in the past few years. The first is that the price of gas has been relatively steady, which means Americans don't have to invest as much of their paychecks into gas. Then, there's the fact that fuel efficiency rules implemented by the Obama administration have reduced the amount of fuel that cars need to travel. That means you can save money on gas by driving in more efficient vehicles. "The gas itself has been quite inexpensive, and it's a very easy thing to fill up," Whitney said. "As
